

Global leaders meet in Geneva to discuss climate and energy policy

World leaders gathered in Geneva this week for a high-stakes summit addressing climate change, energy security, and sustainable growth. Delegations from over 100 countries attended the three-day event, with discussions focusing on renewable investment and carbon neutrality targets.

The United States and the European Union pledged to reduce carbon emissions by 60% by 2035, while developing nations requested more financial aid for green transitions.

The conference also saw commitments for global partnerships in hydrogen energy and carbon capture technologies.

Critics argue that while the promises are ambitious, the implementation remains uncertain without concrete accountability frameworks.
